Thus if we charge a Leyden jar by help of the electrical machine, place near it a wheel in rapid motion, the room being darkened, and then make the electrical discharge, we shall see the wheel quite stationary and sharply defined. The duration of the flash is so short as to be estimated with the greatest difficulty. Although the impression be made thus quietly, it endures for some time. If we use the revolving disc with the slit, and look through it at some well-illuminated object, the successive views are perceptible when the disc turns slowly. When its speed is increased the impressions become more nearly continuous, and at a certain rate we fail to notice any interruption, that is...
